The chemists took ordinary Slllpllte wood pulp, well bleached, and Washed it until it appeared like sirup, clear but thick. This sirup is readily made into tubes of jelly with very thin walls. The tubes are dried, and then are ready for use as sausage casings whenever needed. The cellulose casings have been found to be stout, colorless, and so close to the apDearance of the ancient device that butchers have not suspected the substitution. one listened to, and flowers that no one cared to look at or smell, and food of which no one could eat the hundredth part, when there were so many starving or sick people in the world. Such people were of the same rnetal-though less white-hot--as Kate Barnard, of Oklahoma, who quivers like a flame when she says on public platforms: I swear to God Ill never wear a...
