Excerpt: .when the force of the general opinion of all the rational and right-minded will carry the day; and nothing is more gratifying, amid the present decay of good morals through intemperance, than the specimen, on a limited scale, which this invitation has called out. The sound sense, the effective piety, the full information, with good taste and power of conveying their ideas among the writers, show a high state of intelligence and mental cultivation in the class from which the essays have proceeded, --so that where the sin has most abounded is found the instrument for its counter-action. What happy providences, she remarks, after giving a sketch of the lives of some of the writers, bring most of us at some time in contact with others of a superior nature, or, without natural superiority, having the moral sympathy which attracts and imparts influence. It is not probably the wisest or greatest of those I have known, from whom I have learned the most; but those who took the greatest interest in me;--not those far advanced beyond me in knowledge, but those who were so much before me as to like to bring me up to them. O that I could be to others what some of the good and faithful I have known have been to me, --whose words were as nails in a sure place, not great or sublime, but the truest and best that could then be spoken. This is God's gift...
