An account of the interesting session of the society on the first of May is given. An account and drawings of Saturn, as described 250 years ago, forms a three page article. Five pages, with diagrams, is given on the variable stars Sagittae, in which many authorities are cited, by M. Luizert, meteorologist at the observatory at Lyons. There are many short notes, including a view, with illustration, of Mars on May 4 of this year, a stereoscopic photograph of the sun on the 25th of March, 1906, showing two large spots, the height of meteors, radioactive matter in the sun, international congress for solar studies, annals of the Athens Observatory, etc. An eight page article on the surface markings of Jupiter, nicely illustrated, concludes the number. Meudon Congress for Solar Research The third meeting of the International Union for Cooperation in Solar Research, held at Meudon, France, near Paris, for four days, commencing May 20, was attended by some seventy scientists and was apparently highly successful. The sessions were held in the astro-physical observatory, Prof. J. Janssen in the chair. The principal questions discussed were those on actinometric researches and also on sun spots. An important communication was read on the solar constant, saying that it had previously been placed too high, and instead of four ought to be lowered to three or even under that, as indeed...
